The ADA Policy Statement on Children's Airway Health and what it means to the practicing General, Pediatric and Orthodontic practitioners.

Barry Raphael, DMD, a specialist in orthodontics and owner of the Center for Integrative Orthodontics in the New York City Metropolitan area, was involved in the planning committee for the ADA's Second Conference on Children's Airway Health in March of this year. The committee has set up task forces to clarify and implement key issues of the ADA Policy on the Role of Dentistry in Sleep-related Breathing Disorders (2017). So, what does this mean to you in your practice?

Dr. Raphael has spent the past 11 years altering his orthodontic thinking and protocols to handle the medical indications that children present. Priorities shift. Conversations change. Relationships matter even more. Networks grow. And orthodoxies once accepted as fact are now in question.

COURSE OBJECTIVES

- Review the evidence base and rationale for this shift in thinking.
- Look at the assessment of patients for the medical indications for treatment.
- Look at the broad range of services that can be offered to address the anatomical, physiological and behavioral aspects of intervention.
- Finally, address how you can begin to offer these services.

This course is intended for general, pediatric & orthodontic practitioners.

Barry Raphael, DMD

Dr. Barry Raphael has been in the private practice of orthodontics since 1983, carrying on a family tradition since 1950. Over time, his interest in early treatment has led to the incorporation of techniques designed to prevent malocclusion and Airway-Centered Dysfunctions like sleep disordered breathing and oral habits that effect facial growth.

Dr. Raphael teaches these techniques on the graduate level at the Mt Sinai School of Medicine in New York City, and post-graduate level, nationally, internationally and at the Raphael Center for Integrative Education whose mission is to teach patients, parents, and professionals about ACDs and treatment alternatives. Dr. Raphael is immediate past-president of the New Jersey Association of Orthodontists.
